

Dear FCC rep,

Is this country about the freedom to compete? If it is then any proposal on the part of the established players within the communications industry to limit what is arguably the most innovative use of communications technology (commercial satellite radio) since the invention of the radio is in violation of that spirit and restricting consumer choice.

The only thing I listen to when on the road is satellite radio. I recently starting using it for traffic and found it helped me navigate the congestion of DC. Without it I would be mindlessly searching the AM and FM dial to find the same info which is available through XM's web site or on the easy to read display in the car. Neither of which is available through the established players.

This company innovated, they took risks, and it is not the FCC's business to aid established players and punish innovaters who provide a better service to the consumer.

William Banker